War and environmental disruption are like evil twins, often found together. A Vietnam-era slogan proclaimed that "war is not healthy for children and other living things.". And war is indeed a danger to the environment. But perhaps less obviously, environmental disruption also makes wars more likely. The slogan was appropriate for its time.

Of War and the Environment - Legal Planet

The natural environment has been a strategic element of war since the first rock was thrown by the first cave dweller. The armies of ancient Rome and Assyria, to ensure the total capitulation of their enemies, reportedly sowed salt into the cropland of their foes, making the soil useless for farming — an early use of military herbicide, and one of most devastating environmental effects of war.
